U.N. Conference on Trade and Development focuses on need to bolster "knowledge economies"

On July 19, the U.N. Conference on Trade and Development reported that investment in science and technology is the most beneficial aid form for the world's least developed countries (LDCs). According to the Conference's official report, between 2003 and 2005 the world's poorest countries received approximately $827 million per year in aid to be used for research and professional training. This compares with the approximately $1.3 billion per year in aid to be used to improve governance.
